One big benefit of the internet is being able to review general salary data (UK) for many jobs and this can help many people recognise that the job on offer offers good salary and overall package.

Many recruitment companies flourish because of the quality of their consultants but little reward them adequately for their efforts and this can be a large commercial advantage for the ones that do because the consultants are building relationships with both candidates and clients which has a massive benefit for the business in the longer term.

Using a recruitment company is effectively outsourcing a large chunk of the process and this will save you time. Another benefit is that in some instances, you can try out temporary workers before employing them permanently. In some instances you can often get a rebate (within certain time periods) and be provided with another candidate if the first candidate you take on is unsuitable. Recruitment agencies usually pay temporary workers directly and take care of tax issues, which again will save you, time.

Jumping jobs is not easy for most of us and finding the perfect job is something that incurs time, energy and stress so getting it right for the candidate and the company is essential and this is where specialist recruitment firms earn their fees and offer the best service to compete in the long term.
